temples of India are but copies and counterparts of that at Jerusalem. The temple is a large court without apartments, into which the thousands of worshippers, sometimes 100,000 at a time, surge and sway to offer prayers and sacrifices to their respective idols. Their ideas of incarnation locate Brahma, Vishnu or Siva in those idols. But Brahma is an impersonal god, who fills the universe like the air men breathe.

But out of this impersonal god who is the creator of ail things comes Vishnu, a personal god, the preserver of all things. The temples of the first are very few, but of the second very many. Siva is the destroyer, the devil. His temples also are numerous. The limdoos have a day of atonement in their theology like the dows, and annually when that day comes the aliar is eracted in some large field and every man, woman and child in ail the district included in the temple service must bring an offering. Fer several hours priests are engaged slaying the animals—sheep, buffaces and births. The blood is caught in a trench as of old, and when the sacrifices are made a "doomed man," is brought near and smeared from lead to foot by the priests with the blood of the victims; the entrails of the sacrificer are gathered into a pot and placed on his head, and thus besmeared and burdened he makes the circuit of the village, town or city to which the worshipperibelong three times, crying "weel woel woe?"

The Hindoo fails deprives females of souls, but as soon after the birth of a male child as the mother can repair to the temple she must go, carrying her boy with her, and in his intile hands an offering of some sort to his and his mother's god. Sue lays the babe on his back, says a prayer over his face, ther turns him ever and opens his hands so that the rice or money, or whatever the offering may be, shall fail out before the hold. And thus the child offers his first prayer and makes his first efforing. At six years of age he is taken again to the tomple and bound with a number of cords across the shoulder and bre red.
